Andre Breton Nadja English Medokay

Nadja, the second book published by André Breton, is one of the iconic works of the French surrealist movement. It begins with the question "Who am I?" It is based on Breton's actual interactions with a young woman, Nadja, over the course of ten days, and is presumed to be a semi-autobiographical description of his relationship with a mad patient of Pierre Janet. The book's non-linear structure is grounded in reality by references to other Paris surrealists such as Louis Aragon and 44 ...

Nadja (novel) - Wikipedia

Breton, though dealing with abstract concepts, presents nineteen twenties Paris as a magical world in which the author/third person narrator meets a younger woman named Nadja, an unruly waif of pale complexion who attaches herself to our main character, an older, married man, and then draws him into her surprisingly magical web.

André Breton, Nadja Photographs are crucial to the structure and historical reception of this book, but an argument can be made that they are relatively neglected. They serve simple functions, principally either to document places, objects, events, and people mentioned in the text, or to provide what Breton called "anti-literary" mystery.

"Nadja," Russian for the very fleeting beginning of hope, is considered the seminal novel of a relatively brief surrealist literature period in the first half of the 20th Century. Black and white photographs illustrate the cues Breton describes that open the unconscious minds of Nadja and the reader.

While the Manifesto and Nadja both contain some fine ideas and poetic writing, this is the apex of Breton's literary works (at least those that I've read thus far) and is probably his best-known work today. Some consider L'amour fou to be the final part of a trilogy, starting with Nadja and continuing with The Communicating Vessels.
